TERMS OF REFERENCE TO TRANSLATE A TOOLKIT ON FREE, PRIOR AND INFORMED CONSENT ON LAND (FPIC)

Introduction

Food Rights Alliance (FRA) a coalition of over 30 members spread out in all regions of Uganda is implementing an 18 months project Funded by the Democratic Governance Facility (DGF). The project seeks to promote inclusive, equitable land governance in Uganda that fosters optimum land use and upholds people's land rights". Under this project, FRA hired an external consultant to develop community participation guideline and a toolkit to aid communities to meaningfully participate, contribute to and enjoy benefits from National development initiatives, especially within the natural resource sector.

Background to the development of the toolkit

80% of Uganda's land is held under customary tenure system by people mainly living in rural areas with less than 30% of the total land is registered¹. The National Development Plan (NDP) recognizes the fundamental nature of transparent rights of land ownership and improved tenure for all categories of land ownership; and highlights the need to sustain easy access to land for productive investments. The NDP further notes that the current tenure systems present constraints to acquiring land for public infrastructure, urban development and large-scale land-based investments. On its part, the Land Sector Strategic Plan highlights the need to put land and its resources to optimal use to achieve prosperity and industrialization. Government is committed to addressing the multiple social, cultural, economic, ecological and political functions of land; and is further committed to ensuring that land transactions reflect equity and justice. It also highlights the need for strong institutions and procedures for resolving land conflicts and disputes. The National Land policy, 2013 reaffirms these commitments and seeks to ensure "efficient, equitable and optimal utilization and management" of Uganda's land.

On top of an elaborate legal framework for land administration, Uganda also has committed to the FAO Voluntary guidelines on the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries and Forests (VGGTs) and the AU framework on large scale land-based investments. The guidelines in principle spell out the obligations of the state and responsibility of non-state actors including business entrepreneurs. As a matter of principle in implementation, the guidelines uphold human dignity, non-discrimination, equity and justice, gender equality, consultation and participation, transparency among others. The guidelines commit states to take reasonable measures to identify record and respect legitimate tenure rights holders so as to refrain from infringing tenure rights for others. The guidelines further call on government to protect tenure rights holders against the arbitrary laws of their rights including forced evictions. In addition, government is further guided to provide effective and accessible means of justice and ensure that there is prompt, just and fair compensation where tenure rights are taken for public purposes and endeavor to prevent corruption of all forms at all levels in land management and governance.

Whereas the guidelines propose strengthening capacities and operations of implementing agencies, including organizations of farmers, small producers and communities to promote cooperation and participation, the policy and legal frameworks do not create such structures for engagement on land and neither are there guidelines to facilitate this form of cooperation and community participation. Decisions concerning land management, acquisitions, and governance have continued to be made without effective public participation. Hence the urgent need to develop guidelines for a structured community participation and engagement.
